FROM THE CEO

Hello RepuGen Webteam Associates:

Successful Leaders

9th Observation – Desire to Succeed

Leader, by definition, has to possess a desire to succeed; otherwise, they cannot become one. Their passion is not limited to getting promoted at work or becoming rich. Their goal could be to achieve something of note, leave the world a better place, create a product or service of interest and value for their customers, make a meaningful change in the life of their direct reports, colleagues, etc. It could even be a desire for an interesting and more fulfilling life than they experienced in childhood or that of their loved ones.

The two recent examples of the desire to succeed, who also make my list of successful business people, are Steve Jobs and Elon Musk.

Steve Jobs started Apple Computers because he wanted to bring the benefits of computing powers to ordinary people. He grew up when computers were reserved for elites like professors, university students, big businesses, bureaucrats, etc. Jobs wanted to make computers that someone without programming training can use in their daily lives. That is how he ended up starting the Apple Computer company with his friend. The same focus on bringing simplicity for everyday routine in an elegantly designed gadget led to Mac, iTunes, iPad, iPhone, and even Apple Stores, all fantastic businesses with products loved by millions of people worldwide.

Elon Musk, the present-day Steve Jobs, had a similar desire to succeed. He wanted to break banks' monopoly for sending money to people and businesses worldwide, which ended up in the birth of PayPal. He was concerned about car pollution. His desire to tackle global warming resulted in a 100% electric car, Tesla, whose amazing success in the marketplace resulted in electric vehicle manufacturing by every car company. He wanted to reduce the cost of space exploration, so he created Space-X, which reuses launch rockets that used to drop and get wasted in the oceans, resulting in cost savings and fewer toxic materials dropping into the sea. He has started Hyperloop, which can make bullet trains extinct because the pods under the loop can travel at the speed of sound.

Both Steve Jobs and Elon Musk have stated that money was never a factor in their desire for success. It came to them as a by-product of their desire to change the world. They are unique people, and it isn't very smart to try to become like them. However, we should learn how their desire to succeed resulted in world-changing products and should identify our success metrics and inculcate a strong desire to reach those. No matter how small or big, our definition of success and the desire to achieve it will make our lives more fulfilling.

Until next month.....

ANUP KUMAR

I was born in Patna and completed all my education from Patna itself. After completing graduation I started working in Patliputra info solution. I completed my MCA from IGNOU and joined STPI as web developer in Jan 2017.

I joined Repugen in June 2019 and got the opportunity to work under Suraj sir. I have learnt a lot of new things from my teammates and seniors. At present, I am working on GMR Transcription and Text2text project.

I like to play football and chess. I occasionally like to draw and paint landscapes and portraits.

GAUTAM KUMAR

I am a resident of Patna. After completing my graduation (BCA) from Arcade Business College, I started exploring career opportunities in digital marketing. Since my college days, I have been an ardent lover of internet, technology, e-commerce, and online shopping. These things attracted me to start a career in the digital marketing industry.

I started my career with SEMSOLS Technologies in SEO. I joined GMR Web Team in 2018, and I am enjoying my position as a Site Manager.

My hobbies are traveling to new destinations especially winter destinations, playing cricket, reading short stories, and meeting new people. I am thankful to people around me who constantly motivate me even in difficult times.
