FOUNDER'S CORNER

Busy-ness vs. Productivity

During my last visit, I discussed improving productivity. Today, I want to continue that conversation.

This morning, I needed to look up information for a project. I didn't go to the library, sift through books, or take notes by hand - I used ChatGPT to gather insights quickly. That seems obvious - no one expects a researcher to reinvent how information is accessed.

Yet, in our work, we often start solving problems from scratch instead of first identifying existing solutions, tools, or work done by others. This lack of planning prevents us from maximizing leverage and efficiency.

How to Shift from Busy to Productive

1. Ask yourself: "What are you hiring yourself to do?"

Think like a business owner. Identify what you do best, and delegate the rest - to your team or a tool. With AI and automation at our fingertips, finding solutions has never been easier.

2. Busy is a comfortable distraction.

It feels productive, but often, it's just avoidance. Are you busy because it's necessary or because you're reluctant to delegate or use existing tools? If you're constantly working late, chances are you're holding onto tasks that others (or technology) could handle.

3. Productivity requires leadership.

True productivity means stepping out of execution mode and into strategic decision-making. It's about trusting others, delegating, and focusing on high-value work - even when it feels uncertain. Leaders don't just work hard; they work smart by evaluating where their efforts drive the most impact.

If a project is worth doing, the real question is: What's the smartest, most efficient way to do it well? There's nothing wrong with doing work you enjoy - but it's far more rewarding when you see tangible results. Don't settle into familiar habits just because they feel right. Even the most experienced professionals often misjudge how well they leverage existing work and tools.

Make Smarter Choices, Not Just More Work

We all constantly face the "make or buy" decision, yet we rarely stop to evaluate the best option. One of the highest-return investments you can make is assessing your approach before you start working. If you want to grow, focus on the work that only you can do - and delegate the rest. Productivity isn't about doing more; it's about making smarter decisions.

Invest in the right skills, tools, and people. The effort will pay off - not just for the company but also for your growth and success.

Let's work smarter, not just harder.
